The fleet cases reminded me that an aggressive adoption posture does not resolve missing information. Both the innovator and conservative fleets deferred vehicle-to-grid export because warranty and commercial terms were unresolved. At first, similar answers could look like weak context sensitivity, but the shared blocker made that caution reasonable.

The supported-trial case helped clarify the difference: once permission, warranty coverage, and an isolated vehicle were supplied as assumptions, the agent recommended a bounded experiment. I want the agent to explain the next permitted step rather than stop at “defer.” I wonder how the final tool should distinguish a missing document from a genuine reason to reject the application.
